

Mavis - Stories of welcome and exclusion

What we did notice was that the people who had lived in Leicester, or were born in Leicester, were less open. We were brought up in London and everywhere was open house and everybody would go into each other's houses. The Leicester people were not unfriendly, do not get me wrong. But they were less open and they were more circumspect, and they were not quite so friendly. It was not a problem though, you just forced your way in.
